In preparing a Revised Edition of the Latin-English part of this Dictionary, the aim has been so to adapt the work that it may be suited for the middle forms of public schools. It is above all intended to be a Dictionary of Classical Latin, and thus a large number of archaic, or post-Augustan words, have been omitted, while nearly all the important articles have been entirely rewritten, chiefly with the view of introducing a greater number of quotations to illustrate constructions and usage. The historical and geographical notices have been largely increased in number and lessened in size. Etymologies have been added, those of an unambitious kind. It is hoped that the changes that have been made in type and classification will make the work more intelligible, and so more useful. It closely follows and in many points is based on the Dictionary of Professor Georges.*

SIGNS AND ABBREVIATIONS PECULIAR TO THE ENGLISH-LATIN SECTION.

I.—(a) Brackets () enclosing the first syllable of a compound verb, denote that both the simple and compound forms of the verb are in use, as (de)currere. Lack of space, as a rule, has prevented the explanation of the difference in shades of meaning between the two forms. Where the student finds this a difficulty, a reference to the Latin-English section will at once relieve him. An English-Latin Dictionary serves its best purpose when it encourages the beginner to consult quotations from Roman authors in a good Latin Dictionary.

(b) Brackets enclosing a single letter denote that the word was written sometimes with and sometimes without that letter. Thus, ex(s)p ectare shows that the two forms exspectare and expectare were both in use. The table at the beginning of Messrs. Lewis and Short's Latin Dictionary has frequently been consulted in respect to the spelling of doubtful words.

(c) Brackets enclosing a whole word denote that the word may be inserted or omitted according to the context. Thus for "tide," aestus (maritimus) implies that aestus maritimus is the full phrase, for which aestus alone may sometimes serve.

II.—Space has not allowed the insertion of much help in the way of declensions and conjugations, but the genitive of nouns in the fourth declension is given to distinguish them from those of the first. Where such a genitive occurs in a phrase, it is given thus, aestus, -ūs, maritimus. In a few other instances of doubtful words, genitives are also given.

III.—* prefixed to a word denotes that it is of modern or very late Latin origin. † appended to a word denotes that it is only used, in the Classical period, by poets.

IV.—

alq̄s = aliquis
alq̄l = aliquid
alq̄js = alicujus
alq̄i = alicui

alqm = aliquem
alqam = aliquam
alqo = aliquo
alqâ = aliquâ

Ante and Post Aug. == used by writers before and after the time of Augustus.

Circumloc. == circumlocution.

Class. == Classical, i.e. belonging to the best period of Latin literature.

Com. == used by the comic poets.

Comb. == in combination.

Eccl. == used by the ecclesiastical writers. The asterisk (*) is sometimes used to prevent a repetition of Eccl. after each of the derivatives in a single paragraph.

Gram. == used by the Latin grammarians.

Inscrip. == found in inscriptions.

Jetr. == used by the Jurisconsults, or lawyers.

Late; very late == used by authors after the Classical period.

Med. Lat. == Latin of the Middle Ages.

Opp. == in opposition to.

V.—Abbreviations of the names of authors peculiar to the English-Latin section of the Dictionary.

Ammian. Ammianus Marcellinus, historian, 4th cent. A.D.

Cels. A. Cornelius Celsus, writer on medicine, 1st cent. A.D.
